COMMERCONDENT of the London and Chine Telegraph, calling bimself "A Lover of China has addressed a letter to that paper on "The Chinese and how we treat them," in which ! makes some sensible remarks. He considers. it an imperative duty to consider what is most needed to render our relations with the Chinese thoroughly satisfactory. To do this, he says, it is necessary to take a comprehensive view of the whole case. He believes that it is as essential to judge Chinese matters from a Chinese standpoint as it is to faller off somewhat during the past year. take up a similar position in India. That the Oriental is not of a logical turn of mind, is free and easy, wants to be away at his home at some frequent birth, marriage, or death, and has the unfortunate habit of lying, does not occur to him till he is surprised into a passionate outbreak, which timely precaution might have obviated." Now there is a great deal of truth in the foregoing remarks. Englishmen are fre-- quently impatient, unreasonable, and exacting, and completely forget to make any allowance for the natural failings of the natives. We have written on this subject before, and urged a more generous treatment by Euro-The Chinese are often covertly insolent and sometimes most intractable; but, as a rule much more can be done with them by kind. ness, individually, than by barsh words, "A Lover of China," says that during a residence of many years in China-ho line known morchants and business men, who, "by an ac quaintance with, and adaptation to, the native mind, have succeeded better." It is While the shipments to India, Ceylon and the Europeans get on best with the natives, China received only 92 per cent. less piece and we believe that at the present time goods, while the value only fell 7; per cent. Europeans in China are more conversant with the native disposition and habits than they have ever been, and treat the Chinese with more consideration than was formerly extended to them by earlier residents.

"A Lover of China" asks a number of questions, which it would be difficult at present to satisfactorily answer. "How can the insatiable greed of the (Chinese) people be checked? How can they be made honest and truthful? How can those superstitions, such as ancestral worship, which make them refuse to amalgamate with other peoples and hurry home with their money to die at home and be buried in connexion with their own $25 each for two mouths more; family, be removed? How can they be made " unwilling to ruin their constitution and cut off hope of offspring by Opium?" He roplies, truly enough, that all this cannot be effected by force. No one, surely, ever imagined that it could. But it may, "A Lover of China" thinks, be accomplished in great

If the smoking of opium. really lead to the disastrous results stated, let-the Chinaman follow the example of the European and abstain from its use. The English are but supplying a want, and do not seek to invest the drug with any factitious attractions. The Chinese have reason to thank us for a pure article, of best quality and free from adulteration. We have never make it cheaply accessible. Why therefore connection with this trade should weaken the force of our good moral example we are unable to perceive, unless it be from the uncalled-for inculcation of the fact upon them by the busy emissaries of the Anti-Opium.

DIPSOMANIA Probably no similar want is felt so strongly among all classes of society as the need for that provision for the restraint of the habitual drunkard which has more than once seemed almost within reach; but, alse! is now apparently as far off as ever. The cases are of a charactor for which the means at present at our disposal are entirely inadequate. Friends and physicians are alike powerless. Every remedy short of reatraint which has been, and apparently can be, employed-self-respect, affection for others, sense of propriety, every drug in the Pharmacoposia has failed; and all through the country, and in every social grade, in varying proportions, the evil continues. From time to time the need for a remedy finds direct or indirect expression, as in a letter which recently appeared in a contemporary, in which the writer calls urgently for legislation to meet what he rightly regards us a vast and increasing wil. The manifest and manifold difficulties which aurround the subject, and render its manipulation difficult, are not insurmountable, and it is urged that even if the necessary provisions cannot be secured without some infringement upon recognised rights and principles, the evil incurred would be trifling compared with that which is always present and daily reaching

COUNT WALDECK, THE CENTEN-

ARIAN, Count Waldeck died in Paris a few weeks ngo aged 110 years, Arsene Houssaye, in his last letter to the New York Tribune. gives some interesting gossip about him: woman, known here under the name of the Marchedule Lopez, T-had Count Waldeck in front of me; I sat between his wife and his son. As this young gentleman was about 24 years old, I supposed he was a stepson, and scarcely knew on what ground I was standing while chatting with his wife, an English lady of great beauty and distinction. At last I took the bull by the horns "Madame," I said, "you made a heroic sacrifice in devoting yourself to this gallant gentleman of another century." "No," she of my age, because I love him." "I never doubted, Madame, your love for M. de Waleighth wonder of the world." "I understand you, sir; but I love him as a woman I have trouble in believing that he is 100, and I am only 42." "Pardon the curiosity CHEATED HIM IN TRADE TO SAVE of a philosopher whose study is woman. Permit me to place an interrogation point before "Rufus Adams, you are charged on this your heart. "I loved selling of a wagon-load of shoulders to one him from love. I was at that time somewhat in demand. If among all my suitors I chose "I did it out of charity," replied Adams, Count Waldeck it was because I found him the a meek-looking man, gotten up by nature most irresistible." Here is something to console those who are entering M. Flourens' "Third "Charity is a beautiful trait, Mr. Adams," Youth." "And why, Madame, was he the most
